#1

Ask Yourself If You Are In the Right Career

The best thing you can do is ensure you find a career path you are going to love and can make a decent living from. It doesn't have to make you a millionaire, but it should be a great work-life balance.

#2

Keep Track of Your Work Accomplishments

Write down big accomplishments or milestones within your job and stay organized.

You'll need to get on your company's radar in some way that shows your value. This way you'll have more leverage to make more money or ask for more.

#3

Shadow Other Co-Workers and Learn

Ask a few colleagues to show you what they are working on or how something works.

Even if you do not become an expert in something they show you, you'll have a good understanding of how something operates and can speak to it.

Teach Yourself New Skills Outside of Work

This can be doing things on your own, taking certifications, or paying for some online classes (tons out there, and of course don't go into major debt over this).

Research Market Value On Your Career

- Evaluate your current salary compared to others with that title
- Salaries based on locations around the world
- What other job titles in your field are making (your earning potential)
- Salary and company reviews from past or current employees

Ask for A Raise That You Deserve

Many managers will work with you on compensation if you prove your value and case, which will be easier from these above tips.

Sure, it might be a bit scary or intimidating to ask, but you never know the response if you don't ask.

Look For a New Job In Your Field

If you aren't getting the raise you want (or haven't got one at all), start looking elsewhere. You might be afraid of being labelled as a "job hopper," but moving companies for better opportunities is not a bad thing.
